This novel opens with journalist Terry Lawson investigating the apparent death of the volunteer Adam Goldstein. Villagers tell Lawson that the volunteer's death was caused by jinn, or bush spirits. But the real cause of death seems to be suicide and this is what he writes above his byline. In the end, however, Lawson is surprised to discover that he might be mistaken about Goldstein's death. In fact, it appears to him that the volunteer might not even be dead. This novel is a surreal romp through some of the more lurid aspects of Peace Corps life, where the village experience is punctuated by parties as wild and insane as you could possibly imagine.
